TUESDAY EVENING, SEPTEMBER 4.

Many years ago, when the entire Eastern coast was explored by seekers for Captain Kidd's treasure, some men discovered upon an uninhabited island, traces of the white man, and upon pushing their discoveries further they found that a shaft had been sunk into the earth and filled up. For over a century joint stock companies have been at work sicking shafts and tunnelling under the island in hores of an alley feet wide: (to be kept open for of striking the bottom of the pit; but the sea the use of this lot and the lot adjoining on the water has invariably rushed in and driven the workmen out. A few years ago the mouth of a tunnel, running from the sea under the island, was discovered, which, it is supposed, admits the water. The company now operating are building a dam to shut the water off, and feel confident of success in obtaining the treasure. At a distance of one hundred feet down pieces of barrels, oak boxes, grass peculiar to the Spanish main and subterranean chambers have been struck, which the water prevented them from exploring.

The Richmond Enquirer says :-- Forney will never forgive poor Payne for the failure of his attempt to kill Seward. In alluding to the presence of the latter in Philadelphia, with the President, he says:

"Mr. Seward, bearing the ghastly marks of Payne's Mistaken Stabs, looked out upon the scene with a glare very much like Mephistopheles, as he is understood by the later students of that cold and relentless fiend."

A wealthy widow in Pittsburg fell in love with the coachman who drove her to her huspand's grave and finally married him. He unfortunately had a wife living, was arrested for bigamy and implored his second to furnish oail. She chucked him playfully under the chin and bade him go to jail like a man. That's the latest gossip in Pittsburg.
